The Most Famous of Union Labels

History of the Label

The Allied Printing Trades Label dates back to 1886 when delegates attending a convention of the ITU instructed the executive council to create “a seal of suitable design.”

The seal, delegates said, would be used on all printed material, as the customer desired, and use of the seal should be regulated, “so that the product of union labor may be readily known by purchasers, and the demand for publications friendly to the cause of organized workingmen be encouraged.”

At first, printers used the ITU seal, and by 1891, the ITU seal was becoming well known throughout the U.S. and Canada.

But, that didn't satisfy everybody: the photoengravers, printing pressmen, bookbinders and stereotypers and electrotypers felt left out.

So, in 1893, convention delegates told the executive council to prepare another seal – one that would be suitable for all printing trades unions.

The International Allied Printing Trades Association (IAPTA) was founded in 1910. IAPTA today, through its board of governors, adjudicates disputes and protects the label from misuse.

The Allied Label is registered with the U.S. Patent Office of the Commerce Department, with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in Canada, and with the Secretary of State in each of the 50 states in the U.S.

Illegal use, infringement, limitation and counterfeiting of registered trademarks or labels is a criminal offense throughout the U.S. and Canada.

How to Read the Label

A legitimate allied printing label, when properly “read,” will reveal what printer did a certain job.

Tools you may need: a magnifying glass and telephone.

First, as in the enlarged label shown here, the label reveals the city where the printing was done. (The city of origin is always printed in the same place: the half loop at the bottom.)

Second, check the number, which indicates the number assigned to the union printer in the city where the work was done. (The number can be printed at either the left or the right of the label but is always centered between top and bottom.) A copyright designation is often printed opposite the local number.

With this information, the city and number, the Allied Printing Trades Council can identify the printer. While talking to the Allied Printing Trades Council, you can also get other useful information, such as the names of union typesetters, engravers, mailers and others who can work with you.
